CAPTURE, PRISON, ESCAPE, FLIGHT

(part two)

by Giles Richerson McDaniel

In this issue of Family Findings we complete this valuable contribution to our quarterly. Part I is found on pages 16 thru 20 of our January 1978 issue.

I had two reasons for keeping near the river. One, was to use it as a guide; the other, to shun the public roads. We plodded along through the timber 'til about the middle of the afternoon, when we came to a well traveled road--the first we had seen. Just ahead of us a couple of hundred yards, was a shack near the road. Here we got something to eat--the first we had had since the night before. I tried to get the man who lived there to put us over the river, but he said he had broken one of his oars, and could not do it. He directed us to a man three miles further up the river, who had he said, a good boat and would put us over.

The long fast was broken now, and feeling better, we said goodbye and started on another three mile walk, arriving about sun set. Here, the man for whom we were looking readily agreed to ferry us across the river. It was a half mile to the river, but we soon made the distance. The boat was unlocked, and being swung around for us to get in, when suddenly we heard the clattering of horses' feet behind us. We turned to look and saw a squad of federal cavalry coming rapidly. In less than three minutes we were prisoners again. There were eight men, well mounted and well armed, commanded by an officer. We were soon searched and marched back toward the house from which we had just come. I demanded to know the reason for our arrest. The only satisfaction I could get from the officer was, "You are my prisoners; you will find out later." By the time we reached the house it was dark. Without ceremony, the officer informed our host we would all spend the night with him. A pretty good crowd for a three-roomed house! I was not displeased; as we had already been walking about twelve hours. Though worn out, there was no such thing as sleep for me that night! After several hours had passed, the officer in command drew me into conversation with him trying to learn what he could about me. It is too far back in the past for me to repeat the conversation, but snatches of it, or the substance at least, is still remembered. It was evident my answers to his questions were displeasing to him. At last, in answer to his question, as to my residence, he said, "you are a liar!" For a moment I was silent. Then I said, "You are not a gentleman and you are a coward, for no gentleman or brave man would abuse a prisoner as you have abused me. You are surrounded by your armed men who would I suppose, obey you and you yourself have on a pair of pistols. You have had me searched and know that I am unarmed and cannot defend myself. I repeat Sir, that you are a coward!" He replied, "You are a pretty bold youth." I said, "Discard my youth, forget you have these armed men subject to your orders, at your back; make this a personal matter between us; give me one of your pistols, keep the other, and let us shoot it out here and now!" He was stunned and remained silent awhile. When he did speak, it was pleasantly, saying, "Let's forget and be friends." If there was anything I needed then it was a friend, so I consented. He drew from his overcoat pocket a long black bottle filled with whiskey, saying, "We will drink to our friendship." When I saw it, the thought flashed through my mind like lightning, that if I used that bottle right it would turn me loose. After he had drawn the stopper, he passed the bottle to me. I said, "No, 'age first', you drink; then I will drink." He drank and then passed it to me. I turned it up, but knowing the time had come for me to be beastly sober, passed my tongue into the mouth of the bottle so that I did not swallow a drop, though I pretended to. The ice was broken; we were friends then. Very much to my delight he did not ask any other person to drink; but put the bottle back into his pocket. This is why I was pleased; I wanted that whiskey to last through the night, and make him drink all of it. We talked on pleasantly, as though we had always been friends. After a while he proposed to me to repeat. I was ready; we drank as before. It was not long before we repeated again, I following the same tactics. By this time his men were in all sorts of positions in the house, fast asleep. He by this time had grown so friendly, and was in such a fine humor, he permitted me to go out of the house alone. When outside, I knew I had an easy job before me. All I had to do was to walk away. But the night was very dark, cold and sleeting, I could not see my hand before me; knew not where to go; had no overcoat. So I went back in the house. Then I saw the necessity of using a little diplomacy to prevent him from getting too much whiskey and yet to keep him just right, for when daylight came I wanted him to be on the best of terms with me. Suffice it to say, I succeeded. Before sun-rise the next morning there was a wagon near the house, with a pair of horses hitched to it, ready to take us back to St. Louis. Just before time to start, I asked the Captain to permit me to go out of the house with our host, so that I might have a confidential talk with him. He consented, so we two walked out and closed the door behind us. It was but a few steps to the yard-gate, which fastened with a latch and opened to the outside. From the gate across the road to the timber, with an abundance of undergrowth, was not more than thirty feet. I did not stop to talk with our host until we had gotten to the gate. Standing between him and the gate, with my right hand feeling for the latch, I thanked him for his kindness to me through the night. As soon as I discovered the latch would clear the catch, I threw the gate open, saying "Goodbye." With a few jumps I was in the woods and going like a quarter horse. He made no attempt to stop me and what he said when he returned to the house, I don't know. One or two things that occurred that night made me think he would befriend me if he could.

How far I ran, I don't know. I only know I toned down to a walk when I had to. Thinking if there was an attempt made to recapture me they would go in the direction I had gone, I turned square to the left and, after walking a long ways, I stopped and sat down on a log to rest. It was not long before I saw a man walking toward me--about two hundred yards away. I hid behind a big tree, and watched. He continued to walk straight toward me and I became convinced he had seen me. When within about thirty feet of me, I stepped from behind the tree, facing him and said, "Good morning, Sir". He Stopped, evidently surprised, then I knew he had not seen me. I said again, "Good morning, Sir." He returned the salutation, and stood looking at me in silence for a few moments, then asked me; "are you the young man who was arrested on the river yesterday evening?" I said, "No", and asked him if there had been an arrest made. In a moment or two more he said, "You look very much like him." With a forced smile I said, "I can hardly be held responsible for looking like another men." With more earnestness he said, "I believe you are the man," I said, "I am not." We were yet about thirty feet apart. With his last accusation, he said, "You are the man!" I promptly replied by saying, "You are a liar!" and with the speech put my right hand in my bosom. His Irish blood went to his face and he started toward me. I said, "Stop, or I'll shoot you through." He stopped; both his hands were hanging empty; my right in my bosom. I saw he was bluffed, and was unarmed. So was I, but I kept my hand in my bosom. Seeing the futility of trying to deceive him longer I said, "I am the man who was captured on the river yesterday evening, but you are not the man who can do it this morning." He said, "I don't want to arrest you. I am your friend and want to help you." He continued by saying, "I was with you when you were captured yesterday, and was there for the purpose of helping you across the river. Also I saw you when you made your escape this morning and am here now to help you." I was never in a more trying position in my life and felt I could not afford to take any chances. I had recognized him as soon as he came near me and stood all the time with my hand in my bosom. Finally, I said, "If you want to help me, go away and leave me alone." He refused to go. All this time he was inching up a little nearer me, though I had told him a time or two not to approach closer. At last I said, "If you move either foot again I will shoot you." After that he stood still but insisted I misunderstood him; that he was my friend and wanted to help. I repeatedly asked him to leave me, but he would not. Here, I make an honest confession when I say I would not have turned my back on him for any amount of money. Finding my plea to be left alone was fruitless, and fearing the soldiers from whom I had escaped might, at any moment find me, I said to him, "If you are my friend and want to help me, let me search you and see whether or not you are armed." He said he was not armed, but would not allow any man to search him. Then, said I, "Hold your coat out and let me see that you are not armed." He did that. Becoming satisfied he was not armed, and was what he pretended to be, I advanced to him, shook hands with him, and apologized for calling him a liar. I asked him if he could put me over the river. He said he could; that it was about a half mile to a boat. I said, "Let's go in a hurry, and I will pay you two dollars and a half for doing the job." He said he would not charge me anything, but I could spare it he could use it. He was ragged. So we started in a trot for the boat. The half mile was soon done, and we were in the boat. After a few strokes of the oars, I said to him, "I am expecting the soldiers to ride to the river bank any moment and order us back; but remember, this boat will never touch the Missouri shore again until after we have been landed safely on the Illinois side. They may shoot, but you will not turn this boat back!" He felt like he was between two fires. If the soldiers did ride up and order him back and he failed to obey, they would fire on us, and if he did turn back, I would shoot him. Well, I never saw a man work a pair of oars harder. In due time, we landed on the Illinois side, I paid him two dollars and a half, bade him goodbye and walked up the bank ---a free man.

In this story, I must do George justice. He started out with a faithful determination and never lost it. He was faithful to the last. Along toward morning, where we were kept that night, I managed to have a whispered conversation with him, and told him I thought I had a plan by which I would be able to make my escape in the morning, but saw no chance to get him out. He said, "Marse Giles, go, don't stay on my account; they won't treat me half as bad as they will you." I had then seventeen dollars and a half in gold in my pocket. I gave him five, and paid my ferry men two and a half, so I had ten left. The soldiers carried George back to St. Louis to the prison from which we had escaped. He remained there until a federal officer took him out for a servant. After the ice was out of the river, and the boats began to ply the Missouri again, he gave the officer the slip, got aboard a steamer and went up home.

To return to my part of the story. I started immediately through the woods, up the river. After walking a mile or so, came to a railroad and pursued my way along that road all the way to Alton, Illinois, arriving there late in the afternoon. Without wasting time, I went to the river, found the ice hard and solid. Following the wagon tracks, I recrossed into Missouri. The sun had been doing good, honest work the last half of the day, and the mud made walking very hard. About dark the road led me to the bank of a slough, where there was a flat boat with a fisherman's cabin in it. I went aboard and knocked at the door. A woman opened it. I asked if I could spend that night with them; she said I could. I was surprised by the entertainment—a good supper, a good bed, a good breakfast—and they refused to accept pay for the good they had done me.

During the night there had fallen four inches of snow on top of the mud, and by morning was turning very cold. I walked eight miles to Portage, arriving there about noon. I was trying to get to St. Charles on the North Missouri Railroad (now the Wabash). I engaged passage with the mail carrier for the next day from Portage to St. Charles and took the first train to Allen (now Moberly), which was the Western terminus of the road at that time; from Allen to Huntsville, by stage. The day was bitter cold; I had no overcoat, and was almost frozen when we reached Huntsville. Stopping for dinner, but not half long enough for me to get warm a call was made, "Passengers for Glasgow," I looked out and saw a pair of horses hitched to a three-seated sleigh. I walked out and sat on the rear seat. A man who had been eyeing me very closely while in the hotel, came out and sat with me. The third passenger came out and we were gone. The man by my side had on an overcoat and a heavy shawl. We had not gone far when he turned, and looking me right in the eye said, "Young man, you look like you have been sick or confined very closely somewhere." Knowing I was in a county intensely southern I did not hesitate to reply. I said, "You have guessed pretty well; I am an escaped prisoner from Graciot Street Prison." He immediately unpinned his heavy shawl he had over his overcoat, put it around me and pinned it. Then he asked, "Where were you captured?" I answered, "On Blackwater." Then he asked, "Who are you, and where is your home?" After giving him my name and residence, he asked if I was a son of Judge McDaniel. I said, "Yes." He knew my father, and said he was Joe Lewis, a Methodist preacher. I gave him a short sketch of my escape and the trying time I had after I was recaptured, and learned he lived only four miles from where I spent that miserable night. The next day we and several other friends dined at his brother Charles Lewis' home in Glasgow. After dinner we journeyed on horseback, crossing the river on the ice to Judge Taylor Gilliam's. He had known me all my life. If I had been his own son, he could hardly have been more pleased at having me in his home. When it came time for me to make the last lap of my journey home, about fifteen miles, he put me in his overcoat and on his horse and said, "Goodbye, God bless you."

I arrived at home in due time. Hitching my horse at the yard gate, I walked to the front door of my father's house, with my black slouch hat drawn down over my face and knocked. My father answered the knock in person, opened the door and invited me in and on into the family room, where there was a splendid fire in a fireplace. No one else was in the room. With my hat still on, I stood by the fire a moment or two; then turned to him and taking my hat off, I said, "Father, you don't know me!" He looked me in my face and said, "My son!"

HISTORICAL EVENTS IN JACKSON

(By Capt. T. M. Gates, published about 1912. Found in the Charles McMillin scrapbook, now owned by the Jackson-Madison County Library.)

The brick residence now owned by Mrs. J. H. Duke on East Main Street, was built by Mr. James S. Lyon, grandfather of Mrs. Atwell Thompson and her two sisters. Mr. Lyon was a man of means, owning many slaves and large farming interests. His land possessions were situated three or four miles northwest of Jackson, containing five hundred acres or more, and to this day known as the "Lyon farm." Mr. Lyon was one of the leading Whigs of Madison county. During the race for governor between Andrew Johnson and Meridith P. Gentry, the court house in Jackson was crowded to its utmost capacity. It was Gentry's time to open the discussion. He arose dressed in a tailor-made suit, and as he walked to the speaker's stand, he laid a fine gold watch and chain on the table. He was an orator and even every motion of his hand thrilled the audience with rapture. After his first speech was over Andrew Johnson arose amid loud applause (Madison county at this time was largely democratic). As he approached the speaker's stand, he laid a large silver bull's-eye watch with a steel chain attached on the table. Mr. Lyon remarked to the crowd near him: "Look at that demagogue. That bull's-eye watch will make him 500 votes in Madison county," and sure enough that bull's-eye watch exhibited throughout the state, helped to place Johnson in the governor's chair.

A DAY SPENT AMONG THE TOMBS

By Capt. T.M. Gates

(Taken from a scrapbook owned by the late Charles McMillin which contained a collection of columns by Capt. Gates which appeared in the Daily Sun in 1912. The scrapbook is now owned by the Jackson-Madison County Library.)

There is a tall Lombardy poplar tree in Riverside Cemetery that reaches a hundred feet or more from its base toward the sky. After the dawn of day, and at twilight, the sexton informs me, that a mocking bird can be seen perched upon the topmost branch of this tree, and he pours out his sweet notes to its mate, that is nexting in a cedar tree below. Should any of your readers visit this sacred spot at sunrise or at twilight, perhaps they will hear the music of this bird floating over the quiet and beautiful city of our dead.

I spent a day walking among the old tombs in Riverside. For the benefit of your readers, I will mention many things known only to a very few old residents now living in Jackson.

I found a marble slab nearly hidden by weeds, with this inscription, "To the memory of Mary Jane, daughter of William E. Butler, died Nov. 12th, 1821, age 8 years old." This little girl must have been buried in the first cemetery, which was located just above the stone bridge (ed. - near Johnson Street and Airways), and her remains moved to its present resting place.

I found a slab on which was chiseled "In memory of Mrs. Almedia Ann Talbot, wife of Joseph Talbot. Died October 1835." and nearby was a slab marked, "In memory of Joseph Greer, son of Joseph and Almedia Talbot. Died in 1834, age one year."

Some years ago I gave account of the murder of a man named Sanders, and the subsequent hanging of a young man named Jamison, for the crime. Mrs. Almedia Ann Talbot, mentioned above was Miss Almedia Ann Sanders. Young Jamison was madly in love with Miss Sanders. Mr. Sanders, for reasons known only to himself, refused young Jamison permission to visit his daughter. By the aid of a slave of Mr. Sanders, he was decoyed in a wood-lot, and when Sanders and the slave were approaching a large tree, Jamison jumped out from behind the tree, and slew him with a stick. For this crime Jamison was hung, together with the slave. Jamison and the negro were the first persons hung in Madison county.

There is buried in Riverside one who was born in Wythe county, Virginia, in 1776, a few months after the old Liberty Bell in Philadelphia rang out "freedom to the colonies." Major William Campbell, father of Jno. W. Campbell, and grandfather of General A. W. Campbell, is the one buried in Riverside, who died in Jackson, Tennessee, January 11th, 1842.

Just as you enter the driveway in Riverside cemetery, you will see a slab covering the remains of two little brothers, Eddie and Willie Harkins. Many of the citizens of Jackson will remember the sad death of these two little brothers. The last of December, 1889, or the first day of January, 1890, these two little boys, together with a little son of Mr. James Grogan, were playing in the sank-bank, corner of Lexington and Hays avenues, when suddenly the bank caved in on them, and when found, several hours afterwards, they were just alive, and both died the next day. Also the little son of Mr. Grogan died. It has been twenty years since Mr. and Mrs. Harkins left Jackson, but every year the mother sends to the sexton of Riverside $3.00 to keep in order the graves of her darling little boys. What a lesson this should be to some mothers now living in Jackson, who have children buried in Riverside, whose graves today are covered over with weeds! Walk through the cemetery and you will see many little graves just as I have described.

For the benefit of any who may wish to see the resting places of many who once lived in Jackson but are now forgotten, I will in a brief way describe some that I found.

SARAH DEAN, oldest daughter of Martin and Margaret (Neil) Cartmell, died March 28, 1838.
WILLIAM STODDERT (lawyer), for whom Stoddert street is named, died in Jackson in 1839.
Mrs. H. K. Brown, wife of James Brown, died in Jackson in 1832.
JAMES LEE (merchant), born in Ireland, died in Jackson in 1835, age 23 years.
ELIZA ANN, wife of B. H. LIGON, DIED IN Jackson, Oct. 21st, 1834. Age 19 years.
WM. PLUMMER, son of Rev. C. McKINNEY, died in Jackson in 1853. Rev. C. McKinney at one time was pastor of the First Presbyterian Church.
ELIZABETH, wife of R. I. Chester, died in Jackson in 1841.
WILEY POPE HALE, adjutant of the Second Tenn. Regiment during the Mexican War, wounded at the battle of Cerro Gordo, April 18, 1847, and died three miles from the battle field, age 26 years.
JAMES ELROD (merchant), died in Jackson in 1839, age 48 years.
BERNARD MITCHELL, died in Jackson, May 28th, 1859, age 70 years. Mr. Mitchell reached Jackson in the early 30's on a keel-boat.

The brick vault located in the southern part of Riverside, was build 65 years or more ago by two families named Dorris and Shropshire. There are six bodies buried in this brick vault. These families are extinct at this time, but some relative or one or the other family lives in Knoxville, Tenn., and has had the vault covered with shingles in the last twenty-five years. The roof of the vault at this time is decaying, and rain and sunshine enter the vault.

THE LONE OAK TREE

By Capt. T. M. Gates. Taken from Charles McMillin scrap-book. Written about 1912.

On the left hand as you enter Hollywood Cemetery, there once stood alone a white oak tree. This field, as it was called in 1886, had a dreary lonely look. The hilltop was a bleak, barren knoll, and looked as lonely as the lone oak tree looked at its base.

In 1887 this plot of grand was laid out in burial plots. There once lived in Jackson a lawyer by the name of T. F. Lewis, who with his family moved to Jackson about the year 1885. He was not only a brilliant lawyer, but a man possessed with a high sense of honor. He erected a small cottage home a mile or more from Jackson, on the Poplar Corner road, and soon after it was finished he died. A lot was bought in the new cemetery, and his body was the first laid to rest in Hollywood cemetery. A few months later, one of Jackson's worthy citizens died, Mr. B. F. Howard, father of Gen. B. J. Howard, Charles and Frank. His body was the second laid to rest in Hollywood cemetery.

Twenty-four years have passed since these two bodies were buried in Hollywood cemetery. Now the monuments and markers at the graves outnumber the stars directly above this sacred spot. The Reaper Death has helped to change this bleak and unsightly knoll into a beautiful city of the dead. The lone oak has gone, and the resting home of hundreds of our friends and kin have made this once bleak looking field a dear spot to every heart in Jackson.

HISTORICAL HAPPENINGS IN AND AROUND JACKSON - T. M. Gates

The two-story brick house on the Trenton road, once owned by Mr. Samuel Wallace was the home of Col. Wm. H. Stephens, who led the Jackson boys together with the Sixth Tennessee regiment in the first day's fight at Shiloh. His home was called "Willow Banks", as there were many willow trees in the branch fronting the residence. Col. Stephens was a brilliant lawyer and writer. It was he who wrote what was the "Willow Banks Letter" that caused much comment from the Northern press in 1860. Col. Stephens was small in stature, and had a strong, vigorous voice and there is not one member of the Sixth Tennessee regiment living who will not remember his order when he said: "Guide Center." After the close of the war he moved to the Los Angeles valley and accumulated a large fortune. Col. Stephens was an uncle of Miss Annie Stephens of Jackson.
